

Mörkrets Makter's Mini-Mysteries

Hans Corneel DE ROOS<sup>1</sup>

The discussion about Bram Stoker's possible contribution to Mörkrets makter, the Swedish version of Dracula, and about the identity of the anonymous Swedish editor/translator, has reached no definitive conclusions yet. This paper addresses a series of minor mysteries linked to the Swedish variants: the possible connections between the Budapest, the Chicago and the Stockholm serialisations; the use of certain names (Draculitz, Mary Wood, Valentini's, Zolyva, Koromeszo); references to the Whitechapel Murders and the Thames Torso Mysteries, among others. Although these observations provide no definitive proof regarding the authorship of Mörkrets makter, taken together, they seem to show subtle support for the idea that these Dracula modifications were created entirely in Sweden.

Keywords: Dracula, Makt mykranna, Mörkrets makter, Stoker, piracy.

1. Introduction

In 1986, fiction specialist Richard Dalby was the first to draw attention to the Icelandic version of Dracula, named Makt mykranna, meaning “powers of darkness.” Under this name, it gained a certain fame among Dracula scholars and fans, as the Icelandic preface, translated to English by Joel H. Emerson and published by Dalby in his book The Lair of the White Worm – A Bram Stoker Omnibus (Dalby 1986), contains a reference to the murders committed by Jack the Ripper, which took place in 1888 and shocked all of London. They even gained worldwide notoriety as one of the first crime streaks by an – evidently pathological – serial killer. In his Bram Stoker Journal of 1993 (Dalby 1993), Dalby republished this translation of the preface. Here we read:

But the events are incontrovertible, and so many people know of them that they cannot be denied. This series of crimes has not yet passed from the memory -- a series of crimes which appear to have originated from the same source, and which at the same time created as much repugnance in people everywhere as the murders of Jack the Ripper, which came into the story a little later.

---

<sup>1</sup> Independent researcher, Germany/Philippines, hanscorneelderoos@gmail.com.

This translation suggested that the crimes by Jack the Ripper would be discussed in the Icelandic text of the novel, which Dalby believed to be an abridged translation of Stoker's original. Hence, scholars started searching for allusions to Jack the Ripper in the 1897 edition of Dracula. Some even speculated that Bram Stoker possessed inside knowledge about these so-called Whitechapel Murders, and possibly knew the name of the perpetrator (Davison 1997, 147, pointing to Haining; Storey 2012).

But as I demonstrated in my first paper on the Icelandic version (De Roos 2014a), Makt myrkranna was no abridged translation of Dracula at all: it was a radical modification. In the same paper, I demonstrated that Emerson's translation was faulty; the correct translation is "... the murders of Jack the Ripper, which happened a little later." (my italics)

Accordingly, the Icelandic preface states that the crimes featured in Makt myrkranna must have happened before the Ripper Murders. My suspicion was that the Icelandic (and now the Swedish) texts refer to the so-called "Thames Torso Murders" that had begun previously in 1887 (see Figure 1). In his conversation with Harker, Count Drakulitz (the vampire's name in the Icelandic version) seems to hint at these crimes:

"Yes" – he said breathlessly and the fire virtually burned in his eyes, – "yes, these crimes, these terrible murders, these murdered women, these people found in sacks in the Thames, this blood, that flows, that flows and streams, while the murderer cannot be not found." (my translation from the Icelandic)

Exit Jack the Ripper. Count Draculitz (the vampire's name in the Swedish variants) and his aristocratic London entourage are introduced as the possible culprits in the equally unsolved Thames Torso Murders.

Figure 1. Illustrated Police News, May 28, 1887: gruesome discovery in Rainham

Since my first analysis of Makt myrkranna, much water has flown through the Thames. The question of Stoker's possible involvement in the Icelandic publication was already addressed in this first article, sparked by my observation that several ideas from Stoker's early notes for Dracula that had not made it into his final manuscript seemed to return in the Icelandic version. Since then, other authors such as Clive Bloom, David Skal, Jason Colavita, Rickard Berghorn, Katy Brundan, Melanie Jones, Benjamin Mier-Cruz and Ingmar Söhrman have joined the discussion. After the publication of Powers of Darkness, my English translation from the Icelandic (De Roos 2017a), Berghorn was the one to point to the still earlier Swedish modifications of Dracula that were serialised in the newspaper Dagen and the semi-weekly magazine Aftonbladets Halfvecko-upplaga, both belonging to the Aftonbladet group (De Roos 2017b). As I established, not the Dagen variant unearthed by Berghorn but the (shorter) Halfvecko-upplaga version I obtained directly from the Royal Library in Stockholm was the text that the Icelandic editor and publisher of Fjallkonan, Valdimar Ásmundsson, must have used to create his still shorter Icelandic story, replacing various references to European culture by allusions to the Icelandic sagas (De Roos 2017c). Accordingly, I stopped searching for a direct link between Stoker and Ásmundsson. My research into the backgrounds of the Nordic publications shifted to the questions: (1) who might have been the Swedish editor/ translator and, (2) to what extent Bram Stoker had been personally involved in the Swedish initiative.

2. Who was the Swedish editor/translator?

Regarding the first question, in March 2017 I proposed that Anders Albert Andersson<sup>2</sup> Edenberg (1834-1913), a well-respected senior journalist living and working in Stockholm in the 1890s (see Figure 2), might have been the person who had used the pseudonym "A-e" for these Dracula modifications (De Roos 2017d). Anderson-Edenberg had been the Chief Editor of the monthly magazine Svenska Familj-Journalen that had covered a wide range of literary, cultural and scientific topics; he worked for the magazine for 20 years (1867-1887). He also had translated various works by the later winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature, Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson from Norway. From his contributions to Svenska Familj-Journalen we can see that he was also able to translate from the English. In 1895, he wrote a brochure in German for the Swedish Tourist Association (Anderson-Edenberg, 1895). Interesting enough, by 1899, Anderson-Edenberg had already used the pseudonyms “A. E-g,” “Edbg,” “Eg,” “E-g” and – for his stage play translation – “A.E.” The pseudonym “A-e” would fit both his full name and these previously used initials.

---

<sup>2</sup> Various newspapers use "ss," but in his letterhead and obituaries, he used a single "s."

Figure 2. Anders Albert Anderson-Edenberg (1834-1913)

Moreover, Anderson-Edenberg was a co-founder and the Secretary of Publicistklubben, the Swedish Association of Journalists. In that role, he worked together with Harald Sohlman, the Chief Editor of both Dagen and Aftonbladets Halfvecko-upplaga, on numerous occasions, e.g. for the Festskrift that was created to celebrate Publicistklubben's 25th anniversary in May 1899, just a month before the serialisation of the Swedish Dracula variants kicked off in Dagen (see Figure 3).

Nyss utkommet i alla boklädor :

EKO

Festskrift,
utgifven till
Publicistklubbens
25-årsjubileum.
Pris 1 krona.

Rikt och omväxlande innehåll.
Elegant utstyrel.
Requisitioner torde insändas till C. & E. Gernandts Förlags Aktiebolag, Stockholm.

Textbidrag af Andersson-Edenberg, J. A. Björklund, A. U. Bäckh, Sigröd Elmblad, S. A. Hedlund, G. F. Hedvall, Carl Herslow, Bengt Hägge, Alfred Jensen, Jeremias i Tröstlösa, Aron Jonason, Carl Larsson, Claës Lundin, Georg Nordensvan, Viktor Rydberg, Birger Schöldström, Albert Seberg, Harald Sohlman, Emil Svensén, G. Torelius, Anna Wahlenberg, K. Warburg, Richard Wennerquist, Hugo Victorin, Harald Wieselgren, Henrik Wrånér, Fr. Åkerblom, V. E. Öman.

Artistiska bidrag af Viktor Andren, G. Ankarcröna, Albert Engström, A. Forsberg, N. Kreuger och Carl Larsson.

Porträtt och autografer af klubbens samtliga 38 ordförande, porträtt af klubbens stiftare, af flertalet medverkande författare m. fl.

Figure 3. EKO Festskrift, May 1899

Later, I found still more arguments in favour of Anderson-Edenberg. Many of the cultural references used in Mörkrets makter were also discussed in Anderson-

Edenberg's earlier contributions to Svenska Familj-Journalen, such as a very peculiar phrase describing two stalwart nurses from the Transylvanian convent hospital as "true Valkyries from the Bavarian highlands." Incidentally, Anderson-Edenberg had most probably been the author of an article on the Walhalla Temple near Donaustauf, Bavaria, 420 meters above sea level, with its 14 Valkyrie statues supporting the roof as caryatids, and of a poem titled "Valkyrian," signed "-ed-."

3. To what extent was Stoker himself involved in the Swedish publications?

As to the second question, I spent more than a year trying to find a connection between Bram Stoker and Valdimar Ásmundsson, either direct or via friends or acquaintances they had in common. Although the personal networks of the two writers turned out to be intertwined at a number of points, I never found enough evidence for a communication about the "export" of Dracula to Iceland – a truly tantalising experience. Why did I not give up earlier? Already in January 2014, my Icelandic colleague Ásgeir Jónsson, editor of the third Icelandic edition of Makt myrkranna, wrote to me that the preface to the Icelandic version showed traces of a translation from another language (email of January 26, 2014). His opinion was later confirmed by a group of Icelandic language experts I contacted in January 2016. And my colleague Simone Berni from Italy, who had published a book on the first foreign editions of Dracula (Berni 2014), confirmed to me that while visiting Sweden (especially Stockholm and Malmö) and other Scandinavian countries, he had not been able to find any early variants of Dracula in book form (messages of March 6, 2017). Berni was right, but oversaw, alas, a crucial point. In Sweden, Mörkrets makter was indeed never published as a book (until the 2017 republication, see Berghorn 2017b) – but it was serialised three times. Although this was known to a number of Swedish scholars, they never took the trouble to point it out to international academic circles that might have been interested in these variants. Only after my book Powers of Darkness received excited reviews in major international newspapers and magazines, Rickard Berghorn jumped the bandwagon and burdened himself with the task of finding a connection between London and Stockholm, instead of Reykjavik.

In the spring of 2018, however, I discovered that the last part of the preface to Mörkrets makter (the Swedish equivalent of "powers of darkness"), which had not been translated to Icelandic by Valdemar Ásmundsson, had to a large extent been copied from the memoirs of a well-known Stockholm priest, Bernhard Wadström (1831-1918) (see Figure 4).

Figure 4. Bernhard Wadström (1831-1918) with his collection of prints

Volume 2 of Wadström's memoirs was published in 1899, in Swedish, and contained a number of observations and comments on ghostly apparitions that are echoed in the preface to Mörkrets makter almost verbatim. Volume 1 already contained a description of an encounter with a 'White Lady' that seems to be mirrored in Tom Harker's journal.

Nytt i bokhandeln:

Den heliga historien

af teol. och fl. dr. Alfred Ederheim. Femte delen, Pris 1: 50.
Arbetet kommer fullständigt under detta år i 7 delar, hvaraf subskribenten erhåller den 7:de delen gratis. Subskription motares fortfarande å hela verket hos alla bokhandlare, äfvensom här å Expeditionen. Kartor porträtt af författaren samt utförligt register komma att åtfölja sista delen.

Ur minnet och dagboken

af pastor B. Wadström. Andra delens första häfte, med 20 illustrationer. Pris 1 kr.

Predikningar öfver kyrkoårets nya högmessolexter.

Första årg. 5:te häftet å 50 öre. Hela årgången utkommer i 8 häften å 50 öre. Subskriptionen fortfar.

»Denna samling predikningar af omkring sjuttio lärare i vår svenska kyrka torde kunna räknas bland de bästa som utgivits i vårt land. Predikningarnas författare äro äfven i sin stift, ehuru goda förmågor såsom lärare och predikantor. Hvad som utmärker denna predikossamling är, att predikningarna äro korta, texttroga samt genomdras af verklig kristlig hjärtvärme, där innehållet både är af öfvervägande väckande eller det andliga lifvet närande beskaffenhet. Hvad utstyrelsen angår, är denna också mycket tilltalande. Arbetet är nämligen tryckt med stor vacker och lättläst stil på godt papper. Med glädlige rekommenderas denna predikossamling.» Ledstjärnan.

Bref till en sörjande vän.

Öfversättning af —A—K. Häft. 25 öre.

Under tryckning:

Kristus lefver.	Minnesord till de unga	Hvardagslif
En påsk och pingstbok af dr Fr. Wilhelm Krummacher	under konfirmationstiden af G. Witbrecht.	af Runa. Andra upplagan.

Fosterlands-Stiftelsens Förlags-Expedition.

Nerikestidningen 1899-03-29 SID 1 204

Figure 5. Nerikestidningen of March 29, 1889

Although the second volume was published as a bound book only shortly before Christmas 1899, its content had already been released in three separate booklets. Wadström's chapter on ghostly apparitions appeared in the first booklet of this series, announced in Nerikestidningen of March 29 and April 5, 1899, and in Stockholmstidningen of March 30, 1899 (see Figure 5). It came to the book stores before the preface to Mörkrets makter was published in Dagen of June 10, 1899. (For a detailed overview of these findings, see De Roos 2018b).

This discovery greatly affected my appraisal of the possibility of Stoker's personal involvement in the Swedish variants of Dracula. The Irishman did not understand Swedish, so we can safely exclude the possibility that he had come across Wadström's text himself and personally committed the plagiarism. Just as implausible seems a scenario in which Stoker would have authorised a Swedish newspaper man to include Wadström's words in the preface to Mörkrets makter, and have it signed off with Stoker's initials. And if the preface was a purely Swedish fabrication, this might be true for the rest of the novel as well. In short, my discovery suggests that the Swedish versions were piracies. This still does not bar the possibility that such a piracy was based on an earlier draft of Dracula that had somehow ended up in Stockholm. At least, this is what my colleague Alan Crozier, an Irish academic translator living and working in Sweden, suggested to me in a recent email conversation (July 20, 2021).

Although Crozier's thesis would elegantly explain both the parallels with Stoker's early notes and the plagiarism/piracy scenario, I have serious doubts about this "early draft" theory that I myself had helped launch in 2014.

Until now, the only known typescript of Stoker's vampire tale is the so-called Donaldson typescript, discovered in a barn in Pennsylvania in the 1980's (De Roos 2014b). It is believed to have been created some months before the release of the novel in May 1897. Although commercial typewriters were introduced as early as 1874, they did not become common in offices until after the mid-1880s (English Wikipedia, lemma "typewriter"). I have no information, alas, when precisely Bram Stoker started to use one. According to Tine Hreno, Stoker developed the manuscript of Dracula in handwriting (Hreno 2016). A part of Stoker's research notes are typed out, however (Miller and Eighteen-Bisang 2008, 199ff). Why is this relevant? Only a typewriter allows for the automatic creation of a legible carbon copy. The chance that a busy man like Stoker would use carbon paper to duplicate his own handwriting seems low. Ballpoint pens had not yet been commercially developed, and with a dip pen or fountain pen, it is cumbersome to apply the necessary pressure. Without a copy being present, however, it must have been risky to mail a draft of a novel overseas, taking the chance that it would not be returned. Moreover, Bram Stoker was known for his tendency to keep control of his writing:

“If nothing else, Dracula is a quintessential story of power and control, and Stoker’s early attempts to retain legal authority over his vampire foreshadowed many struggles that would follow.” (Skal 2004, 66).

For me, it is hard to imagine that Stoker would have sent an early draft of Dracula to Sweden, without any binding agreement about its use and without following up to see what had happened to the text. As an alternative, someone close to Stoker could have obtained such a draft and dispatched or brought it to Sweden without informing the author. Again, in light of the way Stoker tended to take control of his interests as a writer and preferred to act as his own literary agent (Stoddart 1897), it is hard to imagine that the Irishman – a professional literary rights trader – simply would have lost sight of his drafts. The arguments both in favour and against such scenarios are based on considerations of plausibility only, however. Until now, no scholar has been able to present proof for either possibility.

4. The mini-mysteries

While the identity of the Swedish editor and Stoker’s own role in the Swedish serialisations may be characterised as the major mysteries surrounding Mörkrets makter, there also exist a number of smaller riddles whose answers, if we could find them, would shed an interesting light on these first ever Dracula modifications.

4.1. Lucy Western and the first U.S. serialisation in the Chicago *Inter Ocean

A peculiar detail I noticed in the first known American serialisation of Dracula (De Roos, 2017 e) is that in the announcement of this serial, Lucy Westenra’s name was given as “Lucy Western” – exactly the same surname as used in the Swedish publications. The U.S. version ran in the Chicago Inter Ocean from May 7, 1899, on until June 4 of the same year, under the title The Strange Story of Dracula; a Tale of Thrilling Adventures, Mystery and Romance.

The announcements appeared on May 3, 4, 5 and 6, each with the same typical error (see Figure 6), that did not show up in the instalments themselves.

Watch for this story—
It's the literary sensation of the year . . . . .

DRACULA
Or, The Human Vampire.
A Powerful Story of the Mystic, Strikingly Original in Topic and Treatment.
BY BRAM STOKER.
First installment will be printed in
The Inter Ocean
Of Sunday, May 7,
With daily installments thereafter until completed.

THE PLOT OF DRACULA:
Dracula is the parent of the adventures of our Jonathan Harker, a solicitor's clerk, who is sent to the castle of Count Dracula, a Transylvanian nobleman, who has bought a house in the edge of London. At the castle Harker meets with many weird and wonderful adventures and ends by discovering that the Count is a vampire—that he has been a hundred years dead, but jumps a century of life by sucking the blood of living people, the younger and fairer the better. As such Dracula has become successful in his own country, and has planned to cross to England. He cannot cross the water save at certain hours, and had arranged at the moment of his trip, to be ship himself to England concealed in a box of earth from his country, in which he has hung throughout the voyage, rising at night to prey upon the sailors of the ship which carries the boxes. The ship at last comes into the port of Whitby, with the captain dead at the wheel, hauled fast, and holding a crucifix. Dracula, who has power to assume almost any animal form, leaps ashore as a huge dog and watches over the moves. His boxes, safely landed, go from Whitby to his London house, Carfax. Hereafter, as a rule, he ranges the town of Whitby and here upon a victim, a certain sleep-walking Lucy Westenra, betrothed to Arthur Holmwood, and friend of Mina Murray, the betrothed of Jonathan Harker. The nightly attacks of the vampire, the leading together of the friends of his victims, his final destruction, and the simultaneous escape of Jonathan Harker and Mina Murray make a thrilling and hair-raising tale.

Whitby to his London house, Carfax. Meantime, as a bat, he ranges the town of Whitby and fixes upon a victim, a certain sleep-walking Lucy Western, betrothed to Arthur Holmwood, and friend of Mina Murray, the betrothed of Jonathan Harker.

Figure 6. Announcement in the Chicago Inter Ocean of May 3, 1899

The rare name “Westenra,” probably of Dutch origin, is prone to being bastardised or “simplified” – but there are many ways to do so. In the Swedish variants, this is the only surname that has been changed (“Dracula,” as we know, is not a surname, but a patronymic). And as we may assume that the Swedish editor/translator was widely read in European cultural issues, and certainly would have had no problems with spelling an exotic word, it would be tempting to suspect that he (or she) may have got hold of a copy of the Chicago Inter Ocean a good month before the Dagen serialisation started, and either was confused by the altered name, or, aware of the error, thought it a good idea to adopt it for his/her own adaptation. It would be a good example of the internationalisation of the press during the 1890s (De Roos 2018c), but more research would be needed to establish whether the Inter Ocean serialisation actually reached the desk of the anonymous Swedish editor.

4.2. The Hungarian connection

The Swedish publications may not only have been linked to the preceding serialisation in the Chicago Inter Ocean. Still earlier, on January 1, 1898, the Hungarian serialisation of Dracula had started in the Hungarian newspaper Budapesti Hírlap. With a few minor deviations, this text was a genuine translation from the English, believed to have been created by the newspaper's Chief Editor, Jenő Rákosi (De Roos 2016) (see Figure 7).

Rákosi not only headed Budapesti Hírlap, but was also the president of Otthon, the Hungarian Press Association, which was one of the largest in Europe. At that time, Hungary was a technologically advanced nation and closely connected with the rest of Europe; the stage plays performed in London and Paris were regularly reviewed in the Hungarian newspapers.

Figure 7. Jenő Rákosi (1842-1929).
Source: Vasárnapi Ujság (1875, 41)

The international cooperation of the press had progressed to the point where it is highly probable that Harald Sohlman and Jenő Rákosi were in touch with each other during the years that Dracula was launched and first published in their respective countries. A few examples may illustrate this:

- Dagens Nyheter of June 28, 1895: Viktor Rakósi, the brother of Jenő, speaks at the Copenhagen Press Meeting.
- Aftonbladet, June 17, 1896: Otthon supports Stockholm's candidacy for the next (Fourth) International Press Congress.
- Svenska Dagbladet, June 26, 1897: Jenő Rakósi is once more elected as Vice-President at the Fourth International Press Congress, Stockholm, June 1897. He is a prominent speaker, next to Sohlman. Anderson-Edenberg, Publicistklubben's Secretary, was one of the organizers of this major event.
- Svenska Dagbladet, June 30, 1897: Rakósi speaks (in French) at the Fourth International Press Congress, and will remain in Sweden after this event.
- Svenska Dagbladet, July 20, 1897: Jenő Rakósi and French colleagues visit the North Cape in northern Norway to see the midnight sun.
- Aftonbladet, September 18, 1897: Jenő Rakósi congratulates King Oscar per telegram, which is sent to the Aftonbladet office, not to the Royal Court.
- Aftonbladet, November 16, 1897: Otthon thanks Publicistklubben for its hospitality during the Fourth International Press Congress.
- Dagens Nyheter, March 2, 1898: Rákosi publishes an article in La Presse Internationale, Paris, about the relationship between Norway and Sweden.
- Göteborgsposten and Svenska Dagbladet, February 11, 1899: Harald Sohlman will be part of the ten-person delegation of Swedish journalists to the International Press Congress in Rome. Here he meets Jenő Rakósi again.

- Aftonbladet, July 24, 1899: Aftonbladet launches an international press protest to support the Finnish free press; representatives of Otthon are among the first to sign the petition.
- 1893-1900: Aftonbladet and Budapesti Hírlap quote from each other, which means that either complete newspaper copies or single news articles were exchanged between the Swedish and Hungarian capitals; Göteborgs Aftonblad of May 5, 1896, 3 and 4, contains a detailed article about the 1896 Hungarian millennial celebration authored by the newspaper's "writer and correspondent from Pest."

It therefore seems very possible that Sohlman had copied the idea to translate and serialise Dracula from his colleague Rákosi.

4.3. The name "Draculitz"

Swedish newspapers from the year 1893 (e.g. Söderhamns Tidning of February 28, 1893) mention a police constable from "Gosspodincze" named "Drakulitz," who was framed for murder. As my colleague Niels Petersen from Denmark found out, a similar article appeared in a Danish newspaper (see Figures 8 and 9).

Randers Dagblad og Folketidende (1874-1970)

AVIS 7. februar 1893

for Grækenlands almene Interesser.

Udflydige dømt. For 7 Aar siden blev en Østsigter i den ungarske By Gosspodincze myrdet, og hans Kone, der tilfald at have dræbt ham i Forening med en Politibetjent Drakulitz, blev dømt til Døden, men benaadet med livsvarigt Fængelsstraf. Drakulitz blev dømt til 15 Aars Forbedringshusarbejde. Nylig har Østsigterens Kone erklæret, at Drakulitz er aldeles uskyldig, og at hun kun havde anlagt ham, fordi hun haabede derved at faa en mildere Straf. Drakulitz er nu bleven sat i Frihed efter at have været i Forbedringshuset i 7 Aar. En ny Undersøgelse af Sagen har vist, at han aldeles ikke havde haft nogen Del i Forbrydelsen. Retten har anmodet Regeringen om, at tilstaa den uskyldige Mand en skæffelig Stadeserstatning.

Figures 8 and 9. Swedish and Danish newspaper articles reporting on police constable Drakulitz

Intrigued by the name “Drakulitz,” which is as good as interchangeable with the name “Draculitz” used in Mörkrets makter, I tried to locate Gosspodincze. After consulting Wiesner’s Der Feldzug der Ungarn gegen die Oesterreicher und Russen im Jahre 1848/49 (Wiesner 1853, 265-267) and Rüstow’s Geschichte des Ungarischen Insurrectionskrieges 1848 (Rüstow 1860, 18-19) (see Figure 10), I believe that “Gospodincze” (modern spelling: Gospođinci) in the north of Serbia, near Csurog (Čurug, or Serbian Cyrillic Чурпур) in the municipality of Josephsdorf or Žabalj (Hungarian: Zsablya, as it is spelled here), must be meant, not Господинце or Gospodintje in Bulgaria. In 1893, this Serbian village of Gosspodincze was a part of the Austrian-Hungarian Double Monarchy. This would imply that the name variant “Drakulitz” would originate from Northern Serbia, not from Transylvania. Volume II of Die österreichisch-ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild (Habsburg, 1891) informs us that before the (second) Battle of Mohács, (1687), the village of Gosspondincze was called “Boldogasszonyszalva,” meaning “Village of our Holy Mary” (Habsburg 1891, 618).

Anstatt jedoch seinen Sieg bei Gospodincze auf diese Weise zu benützen, verlor Perczel das Ziel seiner Aufgabe aus den Augen, wandte sich in entgegengesetzter Richtung gegen Csurog und beging damit, daß er dem betäubten Feinde Zeit zur Besinnung gönnte, den ersten großen Fehler in diesem sonst schönen Feldzuge, der durch die späteren blutigen, aber vergeblichen Angriffe auf Titel nicht mehr gut zu machen war. Am 11. erst, also drei Tage nach seinem Sieg bei Gospodincze, concentrirte er wieder sein Corps in Zsablya, dessen serbische Bewohner die Waffen abliefern und eine Kriegsteuer entrichten mußten; den folgenden Tag schickte er sich endlich zur Vorrückung gegen Titel an.

19

Perczel selbst erreichte am 7. April um Mittag die Linie der Schanzen vor Gospodincze. Nach einer vierstündigen Kanonade schritt er zum Sturm und die Serben verließen alsbald ihre Stellung und traten den Rückzug auf das Plateau von Titel an; verfolgt von den Husaren bis Josephsdorf (Zsablya). Der Verlust der Serben im Treffen von Gospodincze wird auf 500 M., meist Gefangene, und 8 Geschütze angegeben.

Čásl hatte bei Csurog gar keinen Widerstand gefunden; doch fanden immer noch serbische Abtheilungen bei Zsablya und D Besatz. Dieß mochte es sein, was Perczel bewog, sich am 8. April zunächst nach Csurog zu wenden. Als er sich aber überzeugt hatte, daß von Zsablya her nichts zu fürchten sei, beschloß er gegen das Plateau von Titel zu marschieren.

Figure 10. A. C. Wiesner’s Der Feldzug der Ungarn gegen die Oesterreicher und Russen im Jahre 1848/49

and W. Rüstow’s Geschichte des Ungarischen Insurrectionskrieges 1848, both mentioning Gosspodincze.

Johann Galletti’s “Allgemeines Geographisches Wörterbuch oder Alphabetische Darstellung aller Länder, Städte, Flecken, Dorfer, Ortschaften, Meere, Flüsse u.s.w.” (Galletti 1822, Vol. I, column 731) places Gosspodincze near Peterwardein (Petrovaradin; Serbian Cyrillic: Петроварадин), then in “Slavonien” (Slawonien, Slavonia). By 1893, Slavonia was a part of Eastern Croatia, while Peterwardein was located in Northern Serbia, in the province of Vojvodina, where the aforementioned Serbian Gospondincze was also located. We can thus assume that this Serbian province of Vojvodina was the origin of the name “Drakulitz” – most Serbian surnames end with the suffix -ić (Serbian Cyrillic: -ић) ([itɕ]), which originally is a Slavic diminutive used to create patronymics. For the Austrians, to whose territory this region belonged, the phonetic transliteration would be “-itz.”

4.4. The six Marys, the three Browns, the four Robinsons and the two Mortons

In the extended Dagen variant, Van Helsing discovers a newspaper article about the death of a young woman named Mary Wood, who worked in a factory producing artificial flowers (p. 487). She was found dead in the little room where she lived with a friend. As the cause of death, the coroner determined complete blood loss, although the body showed no serious wounds. The article states that there had now been several of such mysterious cases, prompting medical circles had started speculating about an epidemic disease, while the police were still investigating. Mary's room mate reported that her friend would often wake up at night and stand at the window, feeling “strange.” She believed it might be due to Mary's friendship with a “fine gentleman” who sometimes came to see her. The dead girl's name is almost identical with that of Arthur's sister, Mary Holmwood, who plays a key role in the novel.

»Dödsfall under egendomliga omständigheter. En ung flicka, Mary Wood, arbetska vid en fabrik för konstgjorda blommor, fanns i går död i den lilla vindskammaren hon en längre tid bebott tillsammans med en kamrat. Den senare märkte först på morgonen hvad som inträffat och anmälde genast dödsfallet för vederbörande myndighet. Medikolegal besigtning anställdes omedelbart, hvilken ledde till det egendomsiga resultatet, att, ehuru intet tecken till yttre våld kunde upptäckas, dödsorsaken måste anses vara en total blodbrist, sådan som endast kunde förklaras genom fullkomlig förblödning. Emellertid syntes intet spår af

Figure 11. Fragment from the Dagen serialisation, p. 487

Using two similar names is considered inelegant in story writing – but that is not all. Vilma's colleague who replaces her while she travels to Hungary is called “Mary Brown,” and Dr. Seward's “old faithful servant” is also named “Mary.” The girl from Zolyva believed to be killed by Harker bears the name “Marya Vasarhély,” while the widow “Maria Brown” is the owner of the house at 15, Victoria Street. She is the third “Brown” in the novel, next to Mary Brown and the young doctor coming to Hillingham. That makes six characters with (almost) the same given name, and three with the same surname. Moreover, after a reference to “Fred Robinson” (Man Friday) in Part I, Mörkrets makter uses the surname “Robinson” four times, while “Morton” is used both for Sir Charles Morton's family and for Seward's assistant-physician.

I cannot quite imagine that Stoker, who took the trouble to optimise several names (Brutus A. Marix became Quincey P. Morris, etc.) would make such a faux pas. If “A-e” invented all these characters, he/she could easily have avoided it as well – but to him/her, it surely would have mattered less than to Stoker, who worked on Dracula for seven years. I suspect that these multiple Marys, Browns, Robinsons and Mortons were invented in Sweden by a copywriter who produced the enormous mass of text needed for the extended version in haste – not by Bram Stoker.

With the Mary Wood episode, we have another series of unexplainable crimes investigated by the police, next to the death of Lucy's mother and the housemaid; a link between the preface and the body of novel. In Dracula, the Count only targets Lucy and Mina, not factory girls, and the police do not investigate his crimes.

4.5. Valentini's Bakery

A few pages later (p. 491), Wilma has a conversation with Captain Barrington Jones and Professor Van Helsing about what she and Tom (Harker) witnessed at Piccadilly after the funeral of Mr. Hawkins. She describes how an elegantly clad young lady met with Baron Szekély, whom she had previously met in Whitby. In Dracula, the location of the corresponding scene is in front of Giuliano's, referring to the jewellery shop of Carlo Giuliano at No. 115, Piccadilly (Klinger 2008, 255, note 37). In Mörkrets makter, however, the place is described as "Valentini's Bakery" – a business that, as far as I could tell, did not exist in London at that time. If Stoker had been the author of Mörkrets makter, he probably would have kept to Giuliano's, a real location, just like the Albemarle Hotel, The Spaniards, or the teahouse of the Aërated Bread Company mentioned in Dracula. That "Giuliano's" is replaced by a fantasy name leads me to suspect that someone other than Stoker wrote this scene.

4.6. The Thames Torso Murders in the Swedish press

As both the Swedish preface and the Count's words seem to hint at the unsolved Thames Torso Murders that shocked London during the period 1887-1889, I wondered whether the Swedish press had reported on these crimes. Already in March 2017, I found a series of articles in the Swedish press – but they do not form a complete report.

About the various remains of a woman's body found near Rainham between May and June 1887, I found no articles published in the same year.

Göteborgsposten of October 9 and 16, 1888, reported on a female torso found at the construction site of the New Scotland Yard office in London-Whitehall, while some of the limbs were found in the Thames at Pimlico. The same incident was reported in Norrköpings Tidningar, Svenska Dagbladet, Helsingborgs Dagblad, Höganäs Tidning and six other Swedish newspapers.

Dagens Nyheter of November 23, 1888 and a dozen of other Swedish newspapers reported that the mutilated body of Frances Annie Hancock was found in the Thames. The newspapers referred to the Ripper as the suspected murderer, however, not to a separate perpetrator who might be responsible for the Thames Mysteries.

Figure 12. Dagens Nyheter of November 23, 1888

On the 17th of this month, a boatman picked up a corpse of a woman from the Thames who was quite elegantly dressed and whose identity the police could establish. It was a girl by the name of Frances Annie Hancock who had been missing since October 21. The same day as she disappeared people saw her in the company of a tall man with a big, light moustache. She wore a golden necklace that was not found on her body. She was completely dressed, except for her hat and shoes. This woman had the same profession as all the other victims of Jack the Ripper but rather worked in higher circles. She frequented the wealthy districts and even had a noble "protector." (My translation from the Swedish).

Under the heading "The Whitechapel Killer in London," Göteborgs Aftonblad of June 11, 1899, reported on the female body parts found in a "package" (paketet) in the Thames near Albert Bridge, Battersea Park. Göteborgsposten, Skåne-halland, and Skånska Posten of the same day brought a similar report. During the following ten days, 18 more newspapers reported on the Battersea events, also mentioning the female remains found in a "package" at St. George's Stairs, Horselydown, 5 miles further east, and some of them pointing to parallels with the Whitehall incidents.

In September 1899, when police constable William Pennett found a headless and legless female torso under a railway arch at Pinchin Street, Whitechapel, Svenska Dagbladet (September 16, 1899, p. 3) and at least six other Swedish newspapers reported on the similarities with the events that had previously taken place in Rainham, Whitehall and Battersea – without mentioning, however, the sacks in which some of the torsos had been found.

The fact that the Swedish newspapers mentioned “packages,” but not “sacks” – the exact word used by the Count – does not exclude the possibility, however, that the reference to the Thames Mysteries was only added in Sweden. If the Swedish editor was a journalist of the calibre of an Anderson-Edenberg, he (or she) probably had access to the London newspapers and may have taken such gruesome descriptions directly from the British press – news from the London Times and the Daily Telegraph reached the Stockholm newsrooms by telegraph every day.

4.7. Who was Dr. Oscar Marlinton, and why did he disappear from history?

Who was Dr. Oscar Marlinton, who reportedly confessed to have committed the Whitechapel Murders, was arrested and identified by the police as the real Jack the Ripper, and then never mentioned again in the dozens of theories about these crimes? Even in Iceland, the infamous Ripper homicides were intensely discussed by the press. While researching the backgrounds of Makt myrkranna, I came across a small article in Fjallkonan of November 11, 1899 – two months before the serialisation of the Icelandic version started in the very same newspaper.

Figure 13. Article in Fjallkonan of November 11, 1899

Jack the Ripper found. People will remember the many and horrific murders of women that took place in London a few years ago, apparently by the same killer, called "Jack de Ripper," whom the police could not find. This murderer has now finally been identified. It is a physician, as suspected, by the name of Oscar Marlinton. He has confessed that he has committed all these murders, and investigations have shown that he is the true "Jack the Ripper." He suffers from attacks of mental illness. He had a young and beautiful wife, who had been unfaithful to him, and this caused him to develop a bitter hatred against all women. He had a busy doctor's office, but sometimes disappeared for days when his fits of madness came upon him, and then he committed the murders. – It is not certain whether he will be sentenced to death, as the murders were committed in a maniacal frenzy. (My translation from the Icelandic).

I always wondered what the source of Valdimar Ásmundsson's article had been, as Google could not find the name "Marlington" in any other newspaper report of that time, and it is not mentioned in any of the current theories around the true identity of the Ripper. The riddle was only solved, in part, when I studied the serialisation of Mörkrets makter in Dagen: Just above one instalment of the story, Dagen had published the news reported by Ásmundsson. Later, I came across dozens of other Swedish newspaper articles, printed between October 6 and 14, 1899, all bringing the same news and referring to Dannebrog (see Figure 14).

Figure 14. Dagens Nyheter of October 9, 1899, p. 3, on the arrest of Dr. Oscar Marlinton

Although this would explain how Ásmundsson heard of the story, it does not tell us who this Oscar Marlinton really was, why he had confessed to the Ripper Murders, and why his name was forgotten by Ripperologists.

4.8. Szolyva and Körösmező

In Mörkrets makter, the detective Tellet, hired by Mr. Hawkins, Tom's employer, is informed about rumours that Harker, after the Count had left for England, had been spotted in the village of Zolyva, about an hour from Castle Draculitz. Harker was said to have frequented a guest house that had become a meeting place for gamblers and drunkards; he was suspected of murdering the innkeeper's daughter. I was intrigued by the origin of the place name. I suspect that "Zolyva" was derived from "Szolyva," today named "Svalyava," in Ukraine, approximately 185 km north-west of the Borgo Pass. Until 1919 it belonged to Hungary, which lost 70% of its territory after World War I. In the days that Mörkrets makter and Makt myrkranna were written, Transylvania was a part of Hungary as well, meaning that, theoretically, Harker could have travelled from Bistritz to Szolyva – then known as a spa town – without a passport.

Another toponym may have been used to create the surname of Prince Elemar Koromeszo, Mary Holmwood's husband. This name may be derived from the city "Körösmező" (French: "Koromez"), today known as "Yasinia." Just like Szolyva, Körösmező today is on Ukrainian territory, but until 1919 belonged to Hungary and thus was well connected to north-east Transylvania. It is located in the Carpathian Mountains 125 km north of Bistritz, near the strategically important Tatar Pass.

4.9. Who created the Swedish illustrations? A hidden signature?

Who was the draughtsman (or -woman) who created these artful drawings for the Dagen serial? I sent enquiries to the Swedish Archive of Newspaper Illustrations, but the conservators there were not able to identify the artist. The original drawings have been lost, and the sketches are unsigned. All I could find was an elegant capital letter "B" that seems to appear on the two only full-page graphics (p. 55 and p. 429). Could this be an initial? I asked Örjan Romefors, senior archivist at the Riksarkivet, once more, but this signature – if it even is one – was not known to him.

Figure 15. An obscure signature? The two examples.

There is one thing we do know, though: the artist must have studied the text very closely, as even small details from the Swedish Dracula story show up in the graphics, such as the heart-shaped diamond hanger, the straw-like hair of the Count's apelike adepts, or the galloons on his peculiar outfit.

I also wondered whether the illustrator had ever been to Whitby – or at least had seen photos or maps of this little town: in the scene where Vilma and Lucy converse with Mr. Swales, the view from the graveyard at St Mary's Church over to the harbour – the scattered rooftops, the piers and the light tower – with Kettleness at the horizon, has an uncanny accuracy.

4.10. The Herschel principle

Recently, I came across another topic from Mörkrets makter that can also be found in Svenska Familj-Journalen (see De Roos 2018a for an overview). In the Dagen version (p. 577), Dr. Seward notes:

In general, it sometimes seems to me that for some time I have been drawn into a whirlpool of abnormal, upsetting and inexplicable phenomena, before which all my knowledge falls short and where it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to always maintain the calm and spiritual balance that a physician needs more than anyone else. Sir John Herschell (sic!) actually claims that to the scientist no phenomena are more welcome than those who seem to overthrow all accepted theories and are in conflict with all known laws, as it is these phenomena which open the field to new discoveries and broaden the intellectual horizon. I may not be a researcher enough to fully feel that way, or I may personally be too strongly affected by these events to be able to view them with the superior calm that is required above all, if experience is to be fruitful. For now, I'm content to jot down everything. - - -

Despite the spelling error that may have been introduced by the newspaper's typesetter, the author of these lines seems to be familiar with the thoughts of Sir John Frederick William Herschel (1792-1872), the English astronomer who named the four moons of Uranus and the seven moons of Saturn. In his Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy (1831), we find many phrases, illustrated by examples from Astronomy, Physics, Optics, Botany, etc. that express exactly the thoughts presented by Seward. I came across four articles in Svenska Familj-Journalen dealing with topics explored by John Herschel and his father, Sir William Herschel (1738-1822), the discoverer of Uranus. In issue XI of Vol. 12 (1873) we find an article on the spectral analysis of sunlight and the Fraunhofer lines, signed "An." ("Populära Föredrag in Naturkunnighet," pp. 329-330). I assume that it was authored by Anderson-Edenberg. In issue XI of Vol. 15 (1876), we find two unsigned articles on colour blindness and telescopes respectively (p. 327-328 and p. 328-330). As the subjects are related, I suspect that Anderson-Edenberg, who was to become the magazine's Editorial Secretary in May 1877, was once more the author.

The 1873 article mentions William Herschel's theory that the sunlight would be created by lucid elements in the sun's atmosphere (see Herschel 1795, 58-59) – a view refuted by Fraunhofer's research on missing lines in the sunlight's spectrum. Colour blindness was a phenomenon extensively explored by John Herschel. And the article on telescopes again mentions William Herschel's work. Finally, we find John Herschel's theories about the temperature of the lunar surface mentioned in an unsigned article about the moon in issue VIII of Vol. 16 (1877, 247 and 249).

In 1899, there were probably dozens of Swedish journalists, translators and fiction writers who had heard the name "John Herschel" – just as today, educated people are familiar with the names of Marie Curie, Niels Bohr, Max Planck, Werner Heisenberg, Albert Einstein, Roger Penrose or Stephen Hawking. But having heard such well-known names is something different from writing an article about the progress in their fields of science. I therefore see these four articles as another hint (not proof) that Anderson-Edenberg was the editor of Mörkrets makter and personally inserted this reference to John Herschel's philosophy of science.

The Count's fascination with scientific experiments and precise observation, and his belief that everything can be explained from the laws of nature (p. 253), might also be informed by Anderson-Edenberg's interest in scientific method. Professor van Helsing's remarks about humankind's limited abilities to observe and understand nature, finally, could equally be taken from Herschel's book that opens with a quote from Bacon's Novum Organum: "Man, as the minister and interpreter of nature, is limited in act and understanding by his observation of the order of nature: neither his knowledge nor his power extends farther." In the rest of his discourse, Herschel repeatedly stresses how limited and often deceptive man's perception of nature through the senses is. Although Stoker's Dracula features a number of technological innovations (telegraph, traveller's typewriter, Kodak camera, phonograph, etc.), Van Helsing's exposé on vampirism is a mixture of folklore and wild guesses about external influences, rather than an attempt to find a rational explanation.<sup>3</sup>

4.11. "In memory of Annabell Lee"

On the next page (p. 578), we find another curious reference. While visiting the churchyard where the Westenra tomb is located, Seward seeks and finds a stone with the epitaph "In memory of Annabell (sic!) Lee" (see Figure 16), and recognises it as a reference to Edgar Allan Poe's "gripping poem" (Poe 1849).<sup>4</sup> He remembers the stone from the hallucinatory visions he experienced during the Carfax soirée, and wonders again what mysterious powers are playing games with him.

---

<sup>3</sup> In Mörkrets makter, Van Helsing explains that vampires are, during their lifetime, obsessed with "evil passions – cruelty, sensuality, blood-thirst." Although they experience "the cessation of the activity of the bodily organs that we call death," this "being, defined by its passions, is not able – or does not want – to free itself from the body which is its link with earthly life.. It still hangs on to it – and as a result of some law we do not know, even after some time it succeeds in taking possession of it, infusing it with a kind of new life and once again using it as a tool for the unholy pleasures which have been its highest happiness – the passions and urges which now more than ever like a raging fire devour its interior and constantly demand new nourishment." (p. 500). Although this is just a fictional explanation, it at least attempts to describe a coherent psychological mechanism, instead of pointing to the possible influence of volcanoes, harmful gases, magnetism or electricity, as Van Helsing does in Dracula.

<sup>4</sup> Seward mentions Poe already the first time when he visits Carfax (Dagen, p. 513).

Figure 16. The Dagen version describing the tombstone of Annabel(l) Lee

Bram Stoker, we may assume, was familiar with Poe's work. His 1892 short story "The Secret of the Growing Gold" deals with a man who murders his wife and buries her under the floor; her hair, however, continues to grow and haunt him. The parallels with Poe's "Telltale Heart" are unmistakable (De Roos 2012 b, 42). In his story "The Squaw," the role of the black cat as the executioner of fate clearly reminds one of Poe's eponymous black cat. More generally, Poe's fascination with a state between life and death, the reanimation of the soul and interventions from beyond the grave ("Ligeia," "Berenice," "The House of Usher," "Morella," "The Case of M. Valdemar," "Metzengerstein," "Some Words with a Mummy," "The Oblong Box," etc.) has been a source of inspiration for all later supernatural fiction. But nowhere in Stoker's work have I seen a direct reference to one of these tales, let alone a mention of Poe's name. Would "Annabel Lee," in which Poe most probably eternalised his love for his young wife Virginia Eliza Clemm (1822-1847), be an exception? Or is it another element added by Anderson-Edenberg, who at least at one occasion read and distributed his own poems at a funeral? (see "Kapten Rydells Jordfästning, in Svenska Dagbladet of May 27, 1900, p. 3 (see Figure 17) and "Stoftet after kapten Alb. Rydell," in Dagen of the next day, p. 1)?

Kapten Rydells jordfästning.

Befälhafvaren å ångfartyget Gauthiod, kapten Albert Rydells jordfästning, ägde rum på lördagen kl. 3 e. m. å Nya kyrkogården.

Stoftet anlände på middagen från Uppsala, där det under den gångna veckan varit bisatt, samt fördes från Norra stationen omedelbart till kyrkogården. • Vid grindarna mötte Sjömannaföreningens medlemmar under dess bägge förbehängda standar, burna af kaptenerna Lübeck och Werner.

Den långa processionen af deltagare, bland hvilka märktes ångaren Gauthiods rederis styrelse, befäl och besättning, kommandörkapten F. S. Malmberg, hammkapten von Sydow m. fl., satte sig därpå i rörelse till den midt framför stora grafkoret belägna familjegravnen, som vackert dekorerats med svart kläde och granris, där den af kransar öfversällade kistan nedsänktes.

Till griften framträdde därpå komministern i Östermalms församling, dr P. J. Th. Carlsson, som, utgående från 36 psalmens 8:e vers: "Huru stor är din godhet, Gud" etc., höll en längre dödsbeaktelse, däri erinrande om huru den afiidne i den svenska sjöfartens annaler intagit ett framstående rum samt huru han genom godhet och välvilja gjort sig allmänt afhållen och högt betrodd och aktad bland dem som dela hans lefnadskall. Hvad hans vänner känna vid den så ofömodadt öppnade griften, det låter sig icke beskrifvas.

Officianten kastade nu, under det standaren sänktes öfver gravnen, de tre skoflarna mull öfver kistan.

Redaktören A. Andersson-Edenberg uppläste därpå af honom författade verser, som äfven utdelades till begrafningsgästerna, hvarpå den högtidliga akten var ändad.

Bland den talrika mängden kransar märktes sådana från rederiaktiebolaget Sveas styrelse, kamrater, 1834 års män.

Figure 17. Svenska Dagbladet of May 27, 1900, p. 3

4.12. Jokala-Adonai

In Dracula, Stoker's reference to Jewish people is not very flattering. Mr. Immanuel Hildesheim from Galatz is described as "a Hebrew of rather the Adelphi Theatre type, with a nose like a sheep, and a fez." Antisemitism was flourishing in London at the end of the 19th century and many of its citizens were convinced that Jack the Ripper was to be found among the Jewish immigrants that had settled in the capital. In her essay “Bloodbrothers: Dracula and Jack the Ripper,” Margaret Davison discusses the notion that “Dracula and Jack the Ripper [...] figured as Jewish, a [...] signifier under whose aegis the fear of syphilis, alien invasion, sexual perversion and political subversion, stood united.” (Davison 1997, 152). For this reason, any reference to Jewish culture in Mörkrets makter deserves our special attention.

We find such a reference in a letter discovered by Harker on his host’s writing desk, addressed to Draculitz and written by a French co-conspirator (Dagen, p. 153):

The letter was in French and bore as a signature a name that was well known from the political chronicle of the last few years. The writer politely acknowledged the receipt of a very significant sum of money (the amount was stated) and referred to the “honourable letter of 16 May” – which means, of the past week<sup>5</sup> – in assuring that information and instructions given therein had already been shared with “the person concerned.” After several obscure allusions, about which I have no clue at all at present, and with the mention of many personalities designated only by their initials, the letter ended with the following phrases:

“All preparations for the great catastrophe are progressing with untiring zeal. Our whole cause is gaining new followers every day. Everyone feels that the Chosen of Mankind have sighed for too long under the unbearable yoke imposed on them by a small-minded and despicable numerical majority. We have outgrown this slave morality and will soon have reached the point where we can proclaim the great liberating message of Jokala-Adonai. The world belongs to The Strong!” - -

“Adonai” is a Hebrew word, אֲדֹנָי, the plural form of “adon” (“Lord”). “Adonai” was (and is) used in Hebrew religion as a substitute for the Tetragrammaton (יהוה or YHWH, in English transcribed as Yahweh), which was considered too holy to be written or pronounced. In turn, it became a holy word itself, especially for Orthodox Jews, and in conversation was replaced by HaShem (“The Name”).

“Jokala” corresponds to the I-participle of the Slovenian verb “jokati” (“to cry,” “to weep”), but I doubt that the author intended to employ it in this way. During the ceremony in the castle’s basement, the Count’s primitive followers use it in their chant “Jokala hai – Peresche wo! – Sintala mai – Sintala ho – Jokala wo – Dracula<sup>6</sup> hai! – hai! – hai! –” In her notes about the Gypsy camp in Whitby, Vilma records a similar-sounding greeting: “Peräsche wo rajtula.” And when Seward joins the circle of Ida Vårkony's friends at Carfax, Prince Koromeszo raises a toast to their host:

<sup>5</sup> Within the context of the story, this is significant, as the Count has previously claimed that all postal communication had been interrupted by the spring floods.

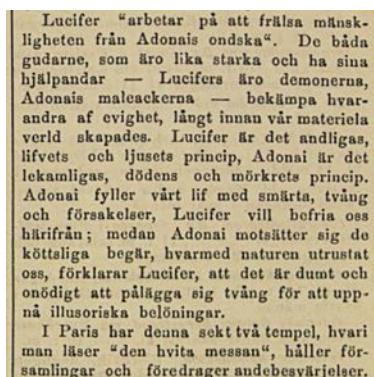

<sup>6</sup> This is the only instance where the name “Dracula” is used instead of “Draculitz.”

“According to ancient custom, gentlemen,” repeated the prince, [...] “according to Szekely's law – in the name we all know – we empty our glasses for her, who represents the highest ideal we worship! Jokala ho! – Peresche wo rajtula!”

After that, the whole company recites the chant sung in the castle's basement. For want of a better explanation, I suspect that the author employs a pseudo-language of his own invention here. Using “Adonai” in this context could mean that the author was satirising certain Jewish religious practices as being overly reverent, just like the Count's adepts who were engaging in a cult-like worship of their leader. In another chapter, however (p. 585), Seward deplors the growing influence of the Jesuits and the rise of antisemitism in Russia, Galicia and Southern France, which remind him of the “darkest Middle Ages.”<sup>7</sup> We may assume that Anderson-Edenberg was familiar with Jewish culture; in September 1899, his wife Gabriella was buried at the graveyard of the local Jewish community (see Figure 18).

Figure 18. Funeral of Gabriella announced in Aftonbladet of September 28, 1899, p. 1 Figure 19. Katrineholms Tidning of September 27, 1895, p. 2 (fragment)

More likely, “Adonai” refers to the god of death and darkness as worshipped by a Paris sect practising “Adonism,” “Palladism” or “Satanism” as described in a book by Jules Bois, reviewed by almost a dozen Swedish newspapers (see Figure 19 and Dagen, p. 628.)

<sup>7</sup> See also Vilma's remarks on p. 409 about Jewish people being falsely accused of crimes.

4.13. Parlez-vous français?

On all other occasions, the inhabitants and visitors of Carfax seem to prefer French. When Seward visits the house for the first time, Madame Saint-Amand, the French Ambassador's young wife with her "Paris chic" elegance, welcomes him with "Madame la comtesse vous attend!" The Countess herself wears her hair in the newest "Paris style," and also addresses the physician in French. The conversations in the house are interspersed with French phrases, from "Ah, ma chère belle!" to "À votre santé, monsieur!" The reason that French is hardly used in Dracula<sup>8</sup> seems simple. In Stoker's narrative, the Count does not cultivate an entourage of loquacious followers from the continent – he hardly speaks a word himself after Chapter 4. We may assume that whoever invented the foreign acolytes, also established the use of French as lingua franca among them.<sup>9</sup> For this, a rudimentary knowledge of French would suffice. As far as we know, Stoker spoke some French, visiting Paris in 1874, 1875 and 1876 (Skal 2016, 119f.), and later together with Irving. Daniel Farson even speculated that Stoker contracted syphilis there (Skal 2016, 493; Farson 1975, 234). As French was used for the "comptes rendus des travaux," the proceedings of the International Press Congresses, we may assume that Anderson-Edenberg, as the Secretary of Publicistklubben, was able to communicate in this language as well.

4.14. ты говоришь по-русски? Sailors with Slavic names

In his log, the captain of the Demeter calls his sailors "Petrofsky" or "Olgaren." In Mörkrets makter, we find "Petter Vassiljewitsch," "Fedor Michailitsch," and "Ivan Petrowitsch Olgaroff." Did Stoker improve his knowledge of Slavic languages after the first publication of Dracula? Or do we owe these new details to Anderson-Edenberg, whose son Erik Anders Magnus operated a trade agency in Moscow? (Dagens Nyheter of September 27, 1897, p. 1). On the whole, in Mörkrets makter Russia plays a more important role than in Dracula. During Leonard's concert, a co-conspirator notes that "Russia has not spoken the last word yet." (p. 582), while Seward deplors the unholy alliance between French Liberals and "Holy Russia" (see Matheson, 2018).<sup>10</sup> Van Helsing adds Russia to the list of countries where the vampire is known and feared, together with India, Java, New Zealand and the Pacific Islands. Did Stoker after May 1897 extend his list? Or is this another input from Sweden?

<sup>8</sup> In her letter to Mina from 17, Chatham Street, Lucy describes Dr. Seward as an "excellent parti," demonstrating her upper-class mastery of French vocabulary (Brundan 2016, 11).

<sup>9</sup> In Mörkrets makter, Vilma also describes Mr. Swales as "esprit fort" and uses "comme il faut" in her notes on the Piccadilly scene. The Count tells Harker "C'est l'amour, l'amour, l'amour qui fait tourner la terre!" There may be more examples I have forgotten to take notes on.

<sup>10</sup> In 1899, Swedish Liberals actively opposed the Russification of Finland (Ch. 4.2 of this essay).

4.15. Arthur as a social reformer

In Mörkrets makter, Lucy states that “Arthur is so interested in social reforms and things like that; he so desperately wants to improve the position of the workers.” (p. 257). In Dracula, Arthur is a typical aristocrat; not unsympathetic, but no idealist. His contribution to the fight against Dracula is to open doors when Harker needs information from a property broker, and to finance the trip to Europe (buying a steamboat on the way). Who decided to add these idealist traits to his character?

4.16. The Count's houses

In Mörkrets makter, the Count, next to the Carfax property,<sup>11</sup> owns houses at 197, Chicksand Street, Mile End, and at Jamaica Lane, Bermondsey, just like in Dracula. The mansion at 347, Piccadilly is replaced by an “old dilapidated house” at Fenchurch Street – Van Helsing has the lock broken by a locksmith, under the pretext of an “anarchist assassination.” The Count also owns an old house at 45, Victoria Street, near Carfax. His real lair seems to be in a modern villa in Hampstead, however, where he spends the night with Madame St. Amand. Here the final showdown takes place. Who invented these extra houses and their location, and for what reason?

4.17. The time frame of the novel

As I explained in March 2012 (De Roos 2012a), it seems that Stoker wanted to keep his readers in the dark about the novel's exact time frame. The Swedish preface states that the “completely unexplainable crimes” the novel describes happened before the Ripper crimes, i.e. before August 31, 1888. Mörkrets makter mention of the anti-Semitic riots in France and Galicia and the “Orléans conspiracy” of 1898-99 (p. 585; see also Berghorn 2017a), suggest, however, that the novel's events must occurred after the first publication of Dracula – most likely in 1898.<sup>12</sup> It is unclear why Stoker would have initiated or endorsed such a new, glaring contradiction.

---

<sup>11</sup> In Parfleet (sic!), one of “London's growing suburbs,” “right next to Hampstead” (p. 650). In the Tip-Top publication, “Parfleet” is replaced by “Purfleet.”

<sup>12</sup> Antisemitic riots took place in Southern France and Western Galicia early in 1898 (Wilson, 1973; Unowsky 2018). Skåningen Eslöfs Tidning of February 3, 1898, discussed both the French anti-Jewish riots, the rising power of the Jesuits and the ambitions of Philippe, Duke of Orléans. Göteborgs-posten of September 21, 1898, and other Swedish newspapers reported on Philippe's anti-Dreyfus manifesto and his announcement to show up in Paris. Svenska Dagbladet and Dagens Nyheter of October 17, 1898 reported on the Duke's arrival in Brussels, exacerbating the threat of a royalist coup. Seward describes the crisis in October (p. 585), also citing the odd alliance between French Republicans and “Holy Russia.”

5. Some more thoughts on the “early draft” theory

Although my notes on this set of “mini-mysteries” covers a wide range of diverse topics, they do convey a certain tendency. The possible links to Chicago and Budapest show that the idea for serialising Dracula in Sweden may not necessarily have come from Stoker or his publisher Constable. The article about the policeman named “Drakulitz” appeared in the Scandinavian, not the British press. The mentioning of “Veltini’s Bakery,” the six-fold use of “Mary” and the multiple use of “Brown,” “Robinson,” and “Morton” suggest that these names did not flow from Stoker’s pen. The use of the toponym “Szolyva” is also untypical of Stoker: in Dracula, the names of locations are either exact (the Albemarle Hotel, Jack Straw’s Castle, The Spaniards, Fundu, Strasba/Strasha/Straja, Veresti, etc.), or fictional (the graveyard of “Kingstead”; No. 347, Piccadilly; No. 197, Chicksand Street, etc.), or they are omitted altogether in case the novelist wished to obscure the exact place (Mount Izvorul). But naming a village presumed to be in or near the Borgo Pass after a town 185 km further north would violate Stoker’s principle to be accurate when using real locations. So does placing Parfleet/Purfleet next to Hampstead.<sup>13</sup> The reference to Sir John Herschel reinforces my argument about Anderson-Edenberg’s possible role in modifying Stoker’s narrative. And referring to events taking place in 1898 does neither match Stoker’s intention of obscuring the novel’s time frame, nor can it be attributed to using an early draft.

In his essay “Dracula’s Way to Sweden,” Berghorn (2017a) suggested that Anne Charlotte Leffler (1849-1892) and her brother Gösta (Gustaf) Mittag-Leffler (1846-1927) might have been instrumental in bringing Stoker’s novel to Stockholm. Trying to check the plausibility of this “very strong working hypothesis” (Berghorn), I managed to obtain scans of a letter and a telegram that Harald Sohlman had sent to Gustaf Leffler on May 15, 1914, and February 5, 1918, respectively. The letter dealt with changes to the Swedish Parliament, the telegram with Finland’s struggle for independence. In both cases, Sohlman asked for Leffler’s political support. In neither case is Mörkrets makter mentioned – which is not surprising as the messages are short and urgent. Even if Leffler would have referred Stoker’s work to Sohlman, we could not expect this to be mentioned in these notes.<sup>14</sup>

Another letter I managed to obtain was from Anderson-Edenberg to Anne Charlotte Edgren née Leffler. In his note of August 20, 1885, he asked for her photo portrait to be published in an upcoming Christmas publication (Julkalender) (see Figure 20). As Dracula was not even conceived of at that time, it could not be discussed. All three letters only serve to demonstrate that during these decades, leading literary personalities in Stockholm were in touch with each other – just like Bram Stoker in the 1890's knew people who had travelled to Iceland or fostered contacts there.

<sup>13</sup> See footnote 11.

<sup>14</sup> I am indebted to Alan Crozier for pointing out the existence of an archive of such letters to me, and for transcribing some of the texts.

Figure 20. Letter of Anderson-Edenberg to Anne Charlotte Edgren (Leffler).

I am afraid that for Rickard Berghorn, trying to find evidence for a relevant communication between Bram Stoker and the Aftonbladet group may turn out to be just as exhausting as it was for me trying to find the “missing link” between Fjallkonan and the author of Dracula.<sup>15</sup>

All I can share from my side is a thought – or perhaps it is rather a sentiment – that gradually matured while I dealt with the questions set out in this essay. If Mörkrets makter is actually based on a draft written by Stoker, then why on earth would he have dropped the many interesting plot ideas we now only know from the Swedish texts: Harker's intimate involvement with the blond vampire girl, the Count's family history as illustrated by a portrait gallery, his leading role in an international political conspiracy, the bloody pseudo-religious rituals taking place in a secret temple underneath the castle, the fortune-telling Gypsies in Whitby,<sup>16</sup>

<sup>15</sup> According to the latest news from his Brazilian publishers (messages of August 17, 2021), Berghorn is neither conclusive about “A-e”'s identity yet, nor about Stoker's real contribution to Mörkrets makter.

<sup>16</sup> Stoker did use this topic in his short story “A Gypsy Prophecy” (Stoker, 1885). Vilma notes that the Whitby band is “wilder” than the Gypsy families long settled in England. Who wrote this?

Vilma's investigations in Hungary uncovering a plot to imitate Harker's appearance, her visit to the castle and her injury, the dramatic reunion at the convent,<sup>17</sup> the hiring of two detectives, the active roles of Mr. Hawkins and Mary Holmwood, the fateful encounters between Dr. Seward and Countess Ida Vårkony, Carfax as the elegant meeting place of international guests, the Count's mental experiments, the usurpation of the asylum by Leonardi and his crew, the death of Prince Koromeszo, etc. If any of these elements was a part of Stoker's original outline, then why did he not follow them up, instead of turning his novel into a rather one-dimensional narrative about a repulsive bloodsucker who mostly hides in the shadows, has no greater ambitions than to "batten on the helpless," and has neither admirers nor minions? Or, alternatively, if none of these elements were included in Stoker's early drafts, then what weight does his input still carry in the end?

Another problem with the "early draft thesis" is that we must wonder why the Aftonbladet group would invest in reworking a draft that Stoker had already discarded, instead of adapting the published version of Dracula that since its release on May 26, 1897 had proven to be quite successful. And if Sohlman had actually decided to do so, why was this not announced as a daring and exclusive literary experiment? Reworking the 1897 edition of Dracula posed a risk as well, of course. It appears that Sohlman was convinced that the changes would lead to a more attractive story. Although I have no data about how many subscribers Dagen and Aftonbladets Halfvecko-upplaga were able to win or hold thanks to Mörkrets makter, at least he seems to have been right regarding the multifacetedness of the plot.

In 2014 Dacre Stoker ventured that his great-grand-uncle might have written a draft that was deemed too sexy for Victorian England and especially for Stoker's editor at Constable, Otto Kylman, and therefore was traded to a faraway, isolated country (De Roos, 2014 a); he upheld this opinion still in 2017 (Branagan, 2017). For two reasons, I doubt that this theory holds water. First of all, was Bram Stoker ever capable of writing a steamy erotic novel? We see no traces of this in his other work, and from his later articles about censorship in fiction and drama, we know that he believed "emotions arising [...] from sex impulses" to be "harmful in the long run" (Stoker, 1908 and 1909). It is difficult to imagine that between 1890 and 1896, the same man would have indulged in the titillating depiction of fully nude young female victims, desperately writhing under the hands of their equally stark naked, apelike tormentors while being stared at by a horde of sneering topless followers. Second, if the prudish attitude of British publishers and readers would have stopped such a text from being published in London, it would have been easy enough to cover this nudity with some fig leaves and to lower the heat by just a few degrees, instead of completely dropping Harker's fascination with the Count's

---

<sup>17</sup> Vilma fears that Tom, "like Dante, could never smile again." Who created this reference?

“niece,” the secret rituals in the castle’s basement, Lucy’s ruinous influence on Arthur or Seward’s desperate dependence on Ida Vårkony. In other words, I have difficulty believing that the eroticism of the Nordic versions came from Stoker, and this also applies – sometimes more, sometimes less – to all the other elements that make Mörkrets makter so rich and multi-layered when compared to Dracula.<sup>18</sup> And if an early draft by Stoker were no more than a skeleton brought to life by a Swedish wordsmith, then why should we continue to be vexed by Stoker’s role at all, instead of focusing on the talent and the skills of Mörkrets makter’s true author? For now, it would be helpful if the advocates of the “early draft theory” would explain what exactly they believe to have been included in such an early sketch, apart from the elements found in Stoker’s early notes: the mute and deaf housekeeper, the Count arriving as the last guest at a party, the blood-red room, a detective investigating the case, Seward turning mad, etc. (see De Roos, 2014 a and 2017 a for more details).

Figure 21. Title (identical for both Swedish variants)

I am happy to drop my scepticism the moment evidence of Stoker’s contribution to the Swedish modifications comes to light. Proof that a draft from Stoker’s hand was used would support my initial comments about his early notes for Dracula.<sup>19</sup> It was not without cause that I changed my opinion, and I am ready to change it again should the facts point in a new direction. For the moment, however, I tend to believe – without definitely excluding any alternative scenarios – that Bram Stoker neither provided an early draft for the Swedish versions of Dracula nor endorsed or helped shape them. In the end, Mörkrets makter may turn out to be exactly what it claims to be in its title (see Figure 21): a novel by Bram Stoker (“Roman af Bram Stoker”) in a Swedish adaptation for Dagen by A-e (“svensk bearbetning for Dagen af A-e”).

<sup>18</sup> Not only the plot, but also the style differs, e.g. in mentioning colours, flowers, operas, etc.

<sup>19</sup> These observations from my 2014 article were adopted both by David Skal (Skal, 2016, 338) and Rickard Berghorn (2017 a) without duly crediting the source of these particular findings.

6. Bonus: The yearnings of Inga Gjæla

Another idea that came to mind while editing this article was to check Anderson-Edenberg's translations of the texts written by Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. Wittingly or unwittingly, writers tend to return to ideas they have already worked on, and although Anderson-Edenberg merely translated these works, I can imagine that they made a lasting impression. For now, I only checked Mellem slagene, a historical drama from 1857, published in Anderson-Edenberg's Swedish translation under the title Mellan drabbningarne by Albert Bonnier in 1867 (Bjørnson, 1867). In this one-act play, Sverre, heir to the Swedish throne, disguised as Öystein, a scout working for his rival King Magnus, is the guest of Hjalvard Gjæla and his wife Inga in their cabin high up in the mountains. Hjalvard dreams of fighting at King Sverre's side, while Inga is frustrated that her husband, zealous to become a warrior, forgets about work, home, wife and child. Neither Hjalvard nor Inga recognize their guest, which gives Sverre a chance to hear their unfiltered opinion about himself.

During the play, Inga complains that she is confined to their isolated home and rarely sees guests she can talk with. I reproduce three examples here (see figure 22):

INGA.

Ej annat jag märker, så menar du att modren skall vara sitt barns trälinna. Du har din fria gång hela Guds långa dagen, men jag skall vara bunden fast vid vaggan. Det är så godt om besök här på fjället, att det blefve ett herrligt lif!

INGA.

Säg det! — Det är så stängdt kring mig på alla sidor; — du vet inte, huru jag längtar efter ljus.

INGA.

Ack nej, jag har ingen lit till dig. Jag står ännu här i fjälldimman och stirrar, men ser icke handsbredden framför mig, och tungt lägger den sig öfver sinnet . . . Ack, — Gud gifve jag vore död!
36

Figure 22. Some of Inga's lines from Mellan drabbningarne

Scene 7 | Inga to Hjalvard: "All I understand is that you think a mother should be her child's slave. You can go out the whole long day if you wish so, but I shall be tied to the cradle. I'm lucky that we have so many visitors here on the mountain – it really is a wonderful life!"<sup>20</sup>

Scene 14 | Inga to Öystein: "Yes, speak up [about your visions]! I feel like I am walled in here from all sides – you don't know how much I long for some light!"

Scene 14 | Inga to Öystein: "No, I don't trust you. I am still standing in the mountain fog and staring ahead. I can't see my hand in front of my face, and it burdens my soul... O God, I wish I were dead!" (my translation from the Swedish).

Inga's ironic remark about the (lack of) visitors and her yearning for a look beyond the walls of her house reminded me of how the blond vampire girl addresses Harker during their first encounter: that he, the stranger, is welcome to her, as it is so lonely in the mountains and it is so rare that a man – a strong man, not a weakling – comes along. She explains that she is longing ("man längtar, längtar, längtar") for "den stora världen därborta" (the big world out there), and for human company. A few pages later, the Count warns Harker about the unhealthy mountain fumes that especially affect visitors.

Is it only my imagination, or is the relationship between Sverre/Öystein (the strong, manly stranger visiting the lonely house in the mountains), Inga (confined to her four walls and longing for company) and Hjalvard (who can leave the house whenever he wants and dreams of partaking in wars) mirrored in the relationship between Harker, the vampire girl and the Count? Of course, it could be a coincidence, but in Dracula, the Count's "brides" do not complain about loneliness, nor does Harker's host mention the mountain fog. If Anderson-Edenberg actually shaped the plot of Mörkrets makter, he may very well have replicated, deliberately or not, the constellation he already knew from Mellan drabbningarne in his adaptation of Stoker's vampire story.

---

<sup>20</sup> In the Norwegian original text, Inga scoffs that it is so crowded on the mountain: "Det er så folksomt her på fjellet, at det blev et herligt liv" (Bjørnson, 1910, 440) (my italics). The phrasing "godt om besök" ("well-visited," "with plenty of visits" or "having so many visitors") comes from Anderson-Edenberg. The change in meaning is minimal.

References

- “A-e.” 1899. Mörkrets makter – Roman af Bram Stoker – Svensk bearbetning for Dagen af A-e. Serialisation in Dagen (June 10, 1899 - Febr. 7, 1900) and Aftonbladets Halfvecko-upplaga (August 16, 1899 - March 31, 1900). The page numbers quoted in this article are taken from the Dagen serialisation.
- Anderson-Edenberg, Albert Anders. 1895. Eine Rundfahrt mit Dampfer um und durch das südliche Schweden. Brochure written for Svenska Turistföreningen.
- Berghorn, Rickard. 2017 a. “Dracula’s Way to Sweden: A Unique Version of Stoker’s Novel.” Weird Webzine, October 2017. Originally published at <https://weirdwebzine.com/draculitz.html>. Archived at <http://powersofdarkness.com/WeWe/DracSwedenOct2017.htm>.
- Berghorn, Rickard (ed). 2017b. Mörkrets makter: Den glömda svenska versionen av Dracula (Swedish edition). Landsbro: Aleph Bokförlag.
- Berni, Simone. 2014. Dracula di Bram Stoker – il mistero delle prime edizioni. Macerata: Biblohaus/Lulu Press.
- Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne. 1867. Mellan drabbningarne, skådespel, äfversatt af A. E. Stockholm: Albert Bonniers Förlag.
- Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne. 1910. Mellem slagerne. In Samlede Værker, Vol. III: 433-456. Kristiania and Kjøbenhavn, Gyldendalske boghandel | Nordisk forlag.
- Brundan, Katy. 2016. “The Polyglot Vampire: The Politics of Translation in Bram Stoker’s Dracula.” Forum for Modern Language Studies 52 (1), January 2016: 1–21. Published on 18 November 2015.
- Dalby, Richard (ed). 1986. The Lair of the White Worm – A Bram Stoker Omnibus. London: Foulsham.
- Dalby, Richard. 1993. “Makt Myrkranna – Power of Darkness.” Bram Stoker Journal 5: 2-8.
- Davison, Carol Margaret. 1997. “Bloodbrothers: Dracula and Jack the Ripper.” In Bram Stoker’s «Dracula» – Sucking Through the Century, 1897-1997, ed. by Carol Margaret Davison, 147-172. Toronto: Dundurn Press.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2012a. Bram Stoker’s Vampire Trap – Vlad the Impaler and his Nameless Double. Linköping University Electronic Press. Published on March 19, 2012.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2012b. The Ultimate Dracula. Munich: Moonlake Editions.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2014a. “Makt Myrkranna – Mother of all Dracula Modifications?” Letter from Castle Dracula, February 4: 3-20.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2014b. “Bram Stoker’s Original Preface for Dracula Revealed?” Letter from Castle Dracula, April 18: 3-21.

- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2016. "'Buda-Pesth seems a wonderful place' – How a Hungarian Newspaperman Produced Dracula's Very First Translation and Serialisation." Letter from Castle Dracula, June 30: 2-11.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel (ed./transl.) 2017a. Powers of Darkness – The Lost Version of Dracula. New York: Overlook/Abrams. With a foreword by Dacre Stoker and an afterword by John Edgar Browning.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2017b. "First and Exclusive Interview with Rickard Berghorn." Children of the Night Conference Bulletin, March 5, 8.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2017c. "The Origin of the First Dracula Adaptation." The Bulletin of the Transilvania University of Braşov, Series IV: 10 (59) No. 1: 131-147. Published in October 2017.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2017d. "Interview avec le (re-)découvreur de Powers of Darkness [addendum]." Hans de Roos interviewed by Adrien Party for the French online magazine Vampirisme.com, March 27, 2017.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2017e. "Next Stop: Chicago! Earliest U.S. Serialisation of Dracula Known so Far Discovered. Was it the Source of Mörkrets Makter?" Vamped.org, May 26, 2017.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2018a. "Was Albert Anders Andersson-Edenberg the First Author to Modify Dracula?" Vamped.org, March 26, 2018.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2018b. "Was the Preface to the Swedish Dracula Version Written by a Priest? Bernhard Wadström and the 'White Lady.'" Vamped.org, May 26, 2018.
- De Roos, Hans Corneel. 2018c. "Early Serialisations and Translations of Dracula, and the Internationalisation of the Press 1890-1900." In The Children of the Night International Dracula Congress in Braşov, October 2018.
- Farson, Daniel. 1975. The Man Who Wrote 'Dracula.' New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Galletti, Johann Georg August. 1822. Allgemeines geographisches Wörterbuch oder alphabetische Darstellung aller Länder, Städte, Flecken, Dorfer, Ortschaften, Meere, Flüsse u.s.w. Pesth: Hartlebens Verlag.
- Habsburg, Rudolf von. 1891. Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild. Band II. Ungarn. Wien: K. k. Hof- und Staatsdruckerei.
- Herschel, John. 1831. A Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy. London: Longman, Rees, Orme, Brown and Green / John Taylor.
- Herschel, William. 1795. "On the Nature and Construction of the Sun and Fixed Stars." Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London 85: 46-72.
- Hreno, Tine. 2016. "Writers in London in the 1890s." Blog, January 26, 2013, <http://1890swriters.blogspot.com/2013/01/stenographic-writing.html>.

- Matheson, Mary Carol. 2018. Reframing Russia in France: 'Popular Diplomacy' and the Franco-Russian Military Alliance, 1871-1901. PhD thesis, the University of British Columbia.
- Miller, Elizabeth and Robert Eighteen-Bisang (eds.). 2008. Bram Stoker's Notes for Dracula: A Facsimile Edition. Jefferson: McFarland.
- Poe, Edgar Allan. 1849. "Annabel Lee." New-York Daily Tribune of October 9, 1849; Southern Literary Messenger, November 1849.
- Rüstow, Wilhelm. 1860. Geschichte des Ungarischen Insurrectionskrieges 1848. Zürich: Friedrich Schultheiß.
- Skal, David J. 2004. Hollywood Gothic – The Tangled Web of Dracula from Novel to Stage to Screen. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux.
- Skal, David J. 2016. Something in the Blood: The Untold Story of Bram Stoker, the Man Who Wrote Dracula. New York: Liveright/Norton.
- Stoddart, Jane. 1897. "Mr. Bram Stoker. A Chat with the Author of Dracula." British Weekly, July 1, 1897.
- Branagan, Mark. 2017. "'Sex and Violence' Version of Dracula TOO Shocking for Victorian Britain." Express (London), online edition, April 23, 2017.
- Storey, Neil. 2012. The Dracula Secrets – Jack the Ripper and the Darkest Sources of Bram Stoker. Stroud, Gloucestershire: The History Press.
- Stoker, Bram. 1885. "A Gipsy Prophecy." First published in The Spirit of the Times, December 26, 1885.
- Stoker, Bram. 1897. Dracula. London: Constable & Co.
- Stoker, Bram. 1908. "The Censorship of Fiction." The Nineteenth Century and After 64 (1908), September issue.
- Stoker, Bram. 1909. "The Censorship of Stage Plays." The Nineteenth Century and After 65 (1909), December issue.
- Unowsky, Daniel. 2018. The Plunder – The 1898 Anti-Jewish Riots in Habsburg Galicia. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Wadström, Bernhard. 1898 and 1899. Ur minnet och dagboken, Volume I and II. Stockholm: Fosterlands Stiftelsen, 1898 and 1899.
- Wiesner, Alois Carl. 1853. Der Feldzug der Ungarn gegen die Oesterreicher und Russen im Jahre 1848/49. Chur: Leonh. Hitz.
- Wilson, Stephen. 1973. "The Anti-Semitic Riots in France in 1898." The Historical Journal 16 (4): 789-806.

Revision 1 of January 27, 2022:

Dates of articles in Göteborgsposten and Svenska Dagbladet, n p. 76/77 corrected (February 11, 1899 instead of November 2, 1899).

Date of De Roos, Hans Corneel 2018a, "Was Albert Anders Andersson-Edenberg the First Author to Modify Dracula?" corrected (2018 instead of 2017).